The Honorable Patrick J. Leahy
Chairman
Committee on the Judiciary
United States Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

Dear Mr. Chairman:

Enclosed please find responses to questions posed to Criminal Division Chief of Staff and Principal Deputy Assistant Attorney General Matthew W. Friedrich, following Mr. Friedrich's appearance before the Committee on June 6, 2006. The subject of the Committee's hearing was the unauthorized disclosure of classified information by the press. We apologize for the length of time our response has required.

You also requested the Department's views on S. 2831, the "Free Flow of Information Act of 2006." On June 20, 2006, the Department provided the Committee with a letter setting forth its views in opposition to this legislation. For your convenience, we have enclosed a copy of the letter for the hearing record.

Senator Leahy also requested the Department's views on data retention by Internet service providers. The Attorney General has commissioned a panel of experts within the Department to examine this issue and provide him with recommendations. That panel's work is ongoing. Therefore, I respectfully request that you allow the Department additional time to finalize its own inquiry before we respond to the Committee's request.

We hope that this information is helpful to you. If we may be of additional assistance in connection with this or any other matter, we trust that you will not hesitate to call upon us. The

The Honorable Patrick J. Leahy

Office of Management and Budget has advised us that from the perspective of the Administration's program, there is no objection to submission of this letter.

Sincerely,

Richard A. Hertling

"Examining DOJ's Investigation of Journalists Who Publish Classified Information: Lessons from the Jack Anderson Case"

Committee on the Judiciary
United States Senate
June 6, 2006

Senator Specter:

1. Last Month Attorney General Gonzales made a series of statements on ABC's This Week program to suggest that DOJ would consider prosecuting a journalist or news organization for publishing classified information.

   - To which statutes was he referring when he said, "There are some statutes on the book, which if you read the language carefully, would seem to indicate that [prosecution of journalists] is a possibility."?
   - Does the Department of Justice share the views of Benno Schmidt and Harold Edgar, who wrote in 1973 that the Espionage Act does not apply to journalists, or the views of Justices White and Stewart, who wrote in the 1971 Pentagon Papers case that the Act does apply to journalists?
   - Title 18, United States Code, Section 798, which bars the willful publication of communications intelligence, appears to apply to journalists. Was this the statute Attorney General Gonzales was discussing?

Answer: The statutes to which the Attorney General was referring were 18 U.S.C. §§ 793 and 798. These two provisions, on their face, do not provide an exemption for any particular profession or class of persons, including journalists. Many judges (including Justices of the United States Supreme Court) and commentators have examined these statutes and reached the same conclusion. In his concurring opinion in the Pentagon Papers case, for example, Justice White wrote, "from the face of [the statute] and from the context of the Act of which it was a part, it seems undeniable that a newspaper, as well as others unconnected with the Government, are vulnerable to prosecution under § 793(e) if they communicate or withhold the materials covered by that section." New York Times v. United States, 403 U.S. 713, 740 (1971). We agree with Senator Specter, who stated on May 2, 2006, in a hearing with FBI Director Mueller, "the White-Stewart opinions" from the Pentagon Papers case "are pretty flat out that there is authority under those statutes to prosecute a newspaper, [and] inferentially [to] prosecute reporters."

In United States v. Morison, 844 F.2d 1057 (4th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 908 (1988), the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit explicitly rejected a defendant's assertion that the First Amendment barred his prosecution under § 793 for unauthorized disclosures of classified information. The Fourth Circuit did so over the objections of numerous news organizations that had filed amicus briefs in the case to press the First Amendment defense against prosecution. Further, several legal commentators have concluded, with respect to §§ 793 and 798, that journalists are not exempt from the reach of these statutes if their elements are otherwise met.

It bears emphasis that the Attorney General has made clear that the Justice Department's primary focus has been and will continue to be investigating and prosecuting leakers, not members of the press. The Department strongly believes that the best approach is to work cooperatively with journalists to persuade them not to publish classified information that can damage national security.

2. How do you square the Attorney General's public comments on the prosecution of journalists with Department of Justice regulations (28 C.F.R. § 50.10) that say that "the prosecutorial power of the government should not be used in such a way that it impairs a reporter's responsibility to cover as broadly as possible controversial public issues"?

Answer: In his "This Week" appearance, the Attorney General was addressing the potential reach of 18 U.S.C. §§ 793 and 798 on their face. The Attorney General's comments are consistent with the Department of Justice's policy, as expressed in 28 C.F.R. § 50.10. Strictly speaking, the provisions of 28 C.F.R. § 50.10 are not "regulations," but a statement of policy that does not "create or recognize any legally enforceable right in any person." See id. at 50.10(n); American Hosp. Ass'n v. Bowen, 834 F.2d 1037, 1046-47 (D.C. Cir. 1987). As set forth in 28 C.F.R. § 50.10, the policy seeks to "balanc[e] the concern that the Department of Justice has for the work of the news media and the Department's obligation to the fair administration of justice." The Department recognizes the vital role that a free press plays in our society. Accordingly, the Department's voluntarily adopted internal policy requires a rigorous internal review – culminating with the Attorney General himself – of not only decisions to prosecute members of the press but also subpoenas aimed at the press, even in cases where the press itself is not the target of the investigation. The policy demonstrates the Department's ongoing commitment to striking a balance between the public's interest in the free dissemination of ideas and its interest in effective law enforcement and the fair administration of justice.

3. The Department of Justice argued at this Committee's October 2005 reporters' privilege hearing that reporters' privilege legislation is not necessary because Department of Justice regulations, namely 28 C.F.R. § 50.10, set forth safeguards and a framework for evaluating requests for journalists' testimony and documents.

   - Do these regulations apply to requests for records of deceased journalists, like Jack Anderson?
   - Does the Department of Justice believe that there should be the same level of First Amendment protection of the notes and confidential sources of deceased journalists?

- Don't some of the national security concerns about the publication of national secrets diminish when a journalist dies? Dead journalists don't publish anymore, after all. Accordingly, doesn't the government's interest in and concern about such materials diminish?

Answer: At the time of my testimony, the Department was reviewing the applicability of 28 C.F.R. § 50.10 to circumstances involving deceased journalists. Subsequent to my testimony, the Department revised the United States Attorneys' Manual to make it clear that "[t]he Department considers the requirements of 28 C.F.R. § 50.10 applicable to the issuance of subpoenas for the journalistic materials and telephone toll records of deceased journalists." United States Attorneys' Manual § 9-13.400.

Separate and apart from the applicability of the Department's policy to deceased journalists, it is the Department's view that, as a legal matter, the treatment of notes and sources of deceased journalists should be the same as that of living journalists. The courts, including the United States Supreme Court in Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972), have held that journalists have no First Amendment privilege against disclosing their sources in response to a grand jury subpoena.

With respect to the Department's views on the effect a journalist's death may have on any national security concerns regarding the journalist's sources or records, such a determination is highly fact-specific and would need to be evaluated on a case-by-case basis.

4. Courts, including the Supreme Court in Swidler & Berlin v. United States, 524 U.S. 399 (1998), have said that testimonial and production privileges, like the attorney-client privilege, apply after the death of the privilege holder.

   - If courts are willing to extend privileges beyond the grave when policy supports it, wouldn't a reporter's privilege better safeguard the First Amendment interests of deceased reporters and their sources?

   - If the attorney-client privilege, marital privilege, psychiatric privilege, and even executive privilege can survive the death of one of the privilege holders, why shouldn't the same thing apply to reporters? What is the policy difference? For instance, is the First Amendment protection of the press any less than the Sixth Amendment right to counsel?

Answer: As noted above, the Department has revised the United States Attorneys' Manual to make it clear that "[t]he Department considers the requirements of 28 C.F.R. § 50.10 applicable to the issuance of subpoenas for the journalistic materials and telephone toll records of deceased journalists." United States Attorneys' Manual § 9-13.400.

As a broader matter, the same courts, including the Supreme Court, that have consistently held that the marital, psychiatric, and attorney-client privileges extend beyond the grave also have consistently held that journalists possess no First Amendment privilege to avoid testifying in response to a valid grand jury subpoena. As the Supreme Court stated in Branzburg, "the Constitution does not, as it never has, exempt the newsman from performing the citizen's normal duty of appearing and furnishing information relevant to the grand jury's task." Branzburg, 408 U.S. at 691.

The Department remains committed – as it always has been – to striking an appropriate balance between the public interest in the free dissemination of ideas and the public's interest in effective law enforcement and national security. Accordingly, the Department believes that, as a legal matter and as a policy matter, legislation in this area is both unnecessary and unwise.

5. The Department of Justice has procedures and regulations in place to address subpoenas to journalists.

   - What similar procedures are in place to ensure that a decision to prosecute a journalist is carefully considered and the First Amendment interests properly weighed. Shouldn't this be a higher standard than the one that applies to subpoenas?

Answer: The Department of Justice takes seriously any investigative or prosecutorial decision that implicates – directly or indirectly – members of the news media, whether it be the issuance of a subpoena or the filing of an indictment. The seriousness with which the Department approaches these decisions is reflected in the Department's governing policy, 28 C.F.R. § 50.10, which is reiterated in the United States Attorneys' Manual.

As is noted in the Department's policy, "the prosecutorial power of the government should not be used in such a way that it impairs a reporter's responsibility to cover as broadly as possible controversial public issues." The Department has never in its history prosecuted a member of the press under section 793, section 798, or any other statute relating to the protection of classified information, even though, as a legal matter, such a prosecution is possible under the law.

The Department's policy requires the express authorization of the Attorney General for any decision to prosecute a member of the news media for an offense committed during the course of, or arising out of, the news gathering or reporting process. In authorizing any such decision, the Attorney General would necessarily seek to "balanc[e] the concern that the Department of Justice has for the work of the news media and the Department's obligation to the fair administration of justice." 28 C.F.R. § 50.10.

6. Section 798 of the Criminal Code was enacted in 1950 in response to a June 7, 1942 Chicago Daily Tribune article that disclosed during wartime that the United States had obtained advanced intelligence of the Japanese navy's attack plans at Midway. This information was later revealed to have come from communications intelligence, specifically intercepted wires and a cracked Japanese code. Section 798 is now being discussed as a potential tool for prosecuting journalists who willfully publish communications intelligence.

- What level of national security threat does the Department of Justice believe is needed for prosecution under section 798? Does the threat need to be imminent? Do we need to be at war?

Answer: As to the requirements of the law, section 798 does not, by its terms, require a showing either that the disclosure of classified communications information resulted in an imminent threat to the United States or that the nation was at war when the disclosure was made. No court has interpreted section 798 as requiring a showing that the disclosure resulted in an imminent threat or occurred in a time of war, nor does the Department believe that such an interpretation would be warranted in light of the clear wording of the statute.

Senator Leahy:

1. You testified that the Department of Justice has never prosecuted a member of the press under 18 U.S.C. § 793 for the publication of national defense information, but believes that such a prosecution could be possible.

    (a) Could section 793 be used to prosecute a journalist for publishing national defense information for the purpose of promoting public debate or selling newspapers?

    (b) What about conduct that is incidental to a journalist publishing a story, such as retaining classified documents that may be used later in a story, or communicating such information to a publisher or other reporters in the course of writing a story? Does the Department believe that section 793 also reaches this type of conduct?

Answer: As the Attorney General has indicated, while there are statutes on the books (including, most notably, 18 U.S.C. §§ 793 and 798) that do not appear to exempt any profession or class of persons from their scope, the Department's "primary focus" is on the leakers of classified information and not the media recipients of that information. Having said that, a leading case in this area, United States v. Morison, 844 F.2d 1057 (4th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 908 (1988), holds that section 793 makes no distinction between the motivations of those who illegally disclose national defense information to someone not authorized to receive it.

In Morison, the defendant claimed that, because he leaked classified national defense information to the news media and not to a foreign power, his actions did not constitute "classic spying" and therefore did not run afoul of section 793. The Fourth Circuit rejected this contention, noting that the language of the statute "includes no limitation to spies or to 'an agent of a foreign government,' either as to the transmitter or the transmittee of the information, and they declare no exemption in favor of one who leaks to the press. It covers 'anyone.' It is difficult to conceive of any language more definite and clear." Morison, 844 F.2d at 1063.

To be clear, the defendant in Morison was not a member of the news media, although he did work part time for a defense publication, and no court has had occasion to consider the application of section 793 to a member of the news media.

With regard to conduct that is incidental to a journalist publishing a story, whether such conduct falls within section 793 will depend on the particular facts and circumstances. Therefore, it would be inappropriate to offer an advisory opinion about the legality of such conduct.

2. Section 798 of title 18 prohibits unauthorized disclosure of classified information pertaining to communications intelligence. Like section 793, section 798 has never been used to prosecute a journalist.

(a) Without getting into the details of any ongoing investigations, has the Department ever considered prosecuting a journalist for publishing classified information under this provision?

(b) Do you believe there is a legally significant difference between the act of publishing a story that reveals only the existence of a classified program involving communications intelligence, and the act of publishing a story that discloses specific details about the program?

Answer: Respectfully, it would be inappropriate to comment upon whether the Department is now considering the prosecution of journalists for publishing classified information. As to whether such prosecutions have ever been considered, my understanding is that there are historical examples where such prosecutions were considered by the Department. See Gabriel Schoenfeld, Has the New York Times Violated the Espionage Act?, Commentary (Mar. 2006), at http://www.commentarymagazine.com/Production/files/schoenfeld0306advance.html.

With regard to whether there is a legally significant difference between publishing the existence of a classified program and the details of such program, the answer would likely depend on the particular facts and circumstances, including the extent to which the existence of the program is classified information.

3. You testified that you think improper classification might be a proper defense to certain statutes involving the dissemination of classified information. Specifically, do you believe that improper classification could be a defense to a case brought under section 798? What about a prosecution under section 793?

Answer: As I stated in my testimony before the Committee on June 6, 2006, improper classification "might be a defense to certain statutes," but it is "not certain" that this defense is available for sections 793 and 798. Some commentators have argued that improper classification could be a defense to prosecution under the Espionage Act. Professors Edgar and Schmidt, for example, in their 1973 article argued that the language of the Espionage Act "suggests that the appropriateness of the classification is a question for the jury." However, in United States v. Boyce, 594 F.2d 1246 (9th Cir. 1979), the Ninth Circuit considered and rejected a defendant's challenge to his conviction under sections 793, 794, and 798 for disclosing communications intelligence to the Soviets. The Ninth Circuit specifically held that "[u]nder section 798, the propriety of the classification is irrelevant. The fact of classification of a document or documents is enough to satisfy the classification element of the offense."

Beyond this Ninth Circuit case, the Department is unaware of any case law that addresses the issue of improper classification as a defense, and we are aware of no case that affirmatively holds that such a defense is available to defendants in Espionage Act cases.

4. Besides sections 793 and 798, are there any other legal authorities that the Justice Department believes could be used to prosecute journalists for publishing classified information?

Answer: Sections 793 and 798 are the two statutes that are most relevant to the vast majority of crime reports the Department receives from Intelligence Community members relating to the unauthorized disclosure of classified information. Depending on the facts and circumstances of any particular case, there may be other statutes of potential applicability.

5. What is the Department's position on whether Congress should enact a new law to criminally punish leaks?

Answer: The Department is prepared to work with the Congress both on crafting new legislation and improving the existing statutory tools at the Department's disposal to combat illegal leaks of classified information.

6. Other than the Jack Anderson case, has the Department made any attempts over the past 5 years to search the files of journalists, either living or deceased?

Answer: I am informed that over the past five years, the Department has approved search warrants for materials related to the news gathering process pursuant to the Privacy Protection Act, 42 U.S.C. § 2000aa et seq., in four cases. The Department also issues subpoenas to reporters pursuant to the policy embodied in 28 C.F.R. § 50.10.

7. You testified that the Department is reviewing its policy for seeking information from the estates of deceased journalists. Is that review complete and, if so, what is the new policy?

Answer: As noted above, this review is complete and the Department has changed its policy. The Department has revised the United States Attorneys' Manual to make it clear that "[t]he Department considers the requirements of 28 C.F.R. § 50.10 applicable to the issuance of subpoenas for the journalistic materials and telephone toll records of deceased journalists." United States Attorneys' Manual § 9-13.400.

U.S. Department of Justice

Office of Legislative Affairs

Office of the Assistant Attorney General

Washington, D.C. 20530

June 20, 2006

The Honorable Arlen Specter
Chairman
Committee on the Judiciary
United States Senate
Washington, D.C. 20510

Dear Mr. Chairman:

This letter presents the views of the Department of Justice on S. 2831, the "Free Flow of Information Act of 2006." S. 2831 would create a "journalist's privilege" to be asserted in a number of circumstances by a covered journalist or "communication service provider" against the compelled disclosure of either a source who provided information under a promise or agreement of confidentiality, or of information obtained while acting in a professional capacity. The Department opposes this legislation because it would subordinate the constitutional and law enforcement responsibilities of the Executive branch — as well as the constitutional rights of criminal defendants — to a privilege favoring selected segments of the media that is not constitutionally required.

Constitutional Concerns

The leading authority on the constitutional status of a journalist's privilege is Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972), which rejected arguments asserting the privilege on First Amendment grounds in the grand jury context. A recent Federal court of appeals decision on the issue, In re Grand Jury, Judith Miller, 438 F.3d 1141 (D.C. Cir. 2006), dismissed arguments questioning the force of Branzburg's holding and applied Branzburg to reject the assertion of a First Amendment journalist's privilege. While some Federal courts have recognized a First Amendment-based journalist's privilege in civil cases — where the Government's law enforcement responsibilities are not directly affected, see Zerilli v. Smith, 656 F.2d 705 (D.C. Cir. 1981) — the privilege proposed in the bill would extend to criminal proceedings, including grand jury investigations, and to the national security context.

In addition, the bill's definitions of privileged "journalist[s]" and "communication service provider[s]" do not exclude the agents and media outlets of hostile foreign entities, and therefore extend protection to these agents against the law enforcement efforts of the United States. For example, the definitions appear to encompass entities such as Al-Manar and its reporters and cameramen. Al-Manar is the media outlet and television station of the terrorist organization Hezbollah. Al-Manar was placed on the Terrorist Exclusion List by the State Department in 2005 and more recently was designated a specially designated global terrorist by the Treasury Department pursuant to Executive Order 13224.

Because the broad privilege established by the bill is not grounded on a constitutional right, we object to any provision that subordinates to the privilege recognized constitutional imperatives, such as Presidential responsibilities under Article II and a defendant's rights under the Sixth Amendment.

President's Authority to Control Classified Information

Section 7 of the bill would permit disclosure where the information or record in question was obtained by the journalist as a result of his eyewitness observation of criminal conduct or the committing of criminal or tortious conduct by the journalist himself. There is an "exception to the exception," providing: "This section does not apply if the alleged criminal or tortious conduct is the act of communicating the documents or information at issue." As we understand it, this latter provision appears to apply to eyewitness or perpetrator information concerning a criminal disclosure of classified national security information, including, for example, the provision of such information to a journalist for an entity such as Al-Manar. Therefore, its effect would be to extend the protection of the privilege to this criminal disclosure of classified national security information. This provision could interfere with the President's constitutional authority to control classified national security information. See generally Department of Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518, 527 (1988) (acknowledging the compelling nature of the President's constitutional authority to classify and control access to information bearing on the national security).

National Security and Law Enforcement Responsibilities of the Executive Branch

Section 9(a)(1) of the bill would permit the Executive branch to obtain a journalist's testimony and information involving source identification only if the Government could demonstrate to a court, by "clear and convincing evidence," that the disclosure is "necessary to prevent an act of terrorism or to prevent significant and actual harm to the national security" and only if "the value of the information that would be disclosed clearly outweighs the harm to the public interest and the free flow of information that would be caused by compelling the disclosure." Similarly exacting standards are required to bypass the privilege under section 9(a)(2) in criminal prosecutions or investigations of unauthorized disclosure of classified information by a Federal employee. The conditions this provision requires the Government to satisfy in order to obtain information critical to national security place impermissible burdens on the constitutional responsibilities of the President and the Executive branch.[1] See generally Haig v. Agee, 453 U.S. 280, 307 (1981) (stressing that "It 'is obvious and unarguable' that no governmental interest is more compelling than the security of the Nation" in rejecting former CIA agent's claim that passport revocation violated First Amendment rights).

Sixth Amendment

Under subsection 5(b) of the bill, defendants could obtain a journalist's testimony or evidence only if they proved to a court by clear and convincing evidence that, inter alia, the information sought was (1) "directly relevant" to guilt or innocence or to a "critical" sentencing fact; (2) "essential"; and (3) non-"peripheral"; and that failure to provide the information sought "would be contrary to the public interest." Thus, a defendant who established that the information or testimony sought was essential information that was directly relevant to innocence still could not obtain it if he could not also persuade a court, by clear and convincing evidence, that nondisclosure of the information would be "contrary to the public interest." This provision is inconsistent with the requirements of the Sixth Amendment.

The Sixth Amendment provides in relevant part: "In all criminal proceedings, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him . . . [and] to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." As the Supreme Court has recognized, "This right is a fundamental element of due process of law." Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14, 19 (1967). Although this right is not absolute, the government bears a heavy burden when it seeks to limit it by statute. As the Second Circuit has explained: "While a defendant's right to call witnesses on his behalf is not absolute, a state's interest in restricting who may be called will be scrutinized closely. In this regard, maximum 'truth gathering,' rather than arbitrary limitation, is the favored goal." Ronson v. Commissioner of Correction, 604 F.2d

[1] In Branzburg, the Supreme Court described the relative weight to be accorded to law enforcement and national security interests in conflict with an asserted journalist's privilege:

> Fair and effective law enforcement aimed at providing security for the person and property of the individual is a fundamental function of government, and the grand jury plays an important, constitutionally mandated role in this process. On the records now before us, we perceive no basis for holding that the public interest in law enforcement and in ensuring effective grand jury proceedings is insufficient to override the consequential, but uncertain, burden on news gathering that is said to result from insisting that reporters, like other citizens, respond to relevant questions put to them in the course of a valid grand jury investigation or criminal trial.

408 U.S. at 690.

176, 178 (2d Cir. 1979) (State court's refusal to call psychiatrist to testify in support of prisoner's insanity defense violated Sixth Amendment right to compulsory process).

The conditions of subsection 5(b) exceed the standards imposed by courts that have given considerable deference to a reporter's privilege, based upon their view that the privilege is constitutionally required. See, e.g., In re Shain, 978 F.2d 850 (4th Cir. 1992) (reporter's privilege against compelled testimony in a criminal case rejected in the absence of government harassment or bad faith); United States v. Criden, 633 F.2d 346, 358-59 (3d Cir. 1980) (constitutional reporter's privilege can be overcome if the movant "demonstrates" and "persuades the court" that the information could not be obtained from other sources and such information is "crucial to the claim"; privilege claim rejected and testimony compelled). A district court recently described the balance to be struck between a constitutionally based journalist's privilege and a defendant's Sixth Amendment rights: A defendant's "Sixth Amendment right to prepare and present a full defense to the charges against him is of such paramount importance that it may be outweighed by a First Amendment journalist privilege only where the journalist's testimony is cumulative or otherwise not material." United States v. Lindh, 210 F.Supp.2d 780, 782 (E.D. Va. 2002) (emphasis added). Last month, the United States District Court for the District of Columbia held that a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to obtain relevant and admissible evidence for his criminal trial could not be subordinated to an asserted reporter's privilege. See United States v. Libby, 2006 WL 1453084 (D.D.C., May 26, 2006).

Based upon the continuing validity of Branzburg and ensuing opinions such as Miller, we conclude that the reporter's privilege described in the bill is not required by the First Amendment. Moreover, on the contrary assumption that the asserted privilege has some constitutional underpinning, the bill's current subordination of criminal defendants' Sixth Amendment rights to the privilege is unsustainable.

Other Concerns

Section 3

The bill's critical definition of "journalist" may be challenged legitimately as both overinclusive and underinclusive. It is overinclusive because, as indicated above, it includes hostile foreign entities as well as a wide-ranging category of entities whose ability to invoke the privilege would present obstacles to efficient law enforcement. However, from the standpoint of free speech principles, the definition could also be considered underinclusive because its discrimination between those who write and disseminate news for financial gain and pursuant to an employment or contractual relationship, on the one hand (the protected segment); and those who do so on an uncompensated or unaffiliated basis, on the other (the unprotected segment), is not rationally related to the purpose of the bill. We question whether a definition that effectively reconciles these conflicting considerations is possible as a practical matter.

We also recommend that section 3 define a "promise or agreement of confidentiality" to mean an assurance of confidentiality granted only upon a journalist's reasonable belief that the assurance is essential to gather news that is of significant public interest and for which reasonable alternative sources do not exist. This definition should exclude an assurance given to a source where the journalist has reasonable cause to believe (1) that the disclosure of the information is itself a crime; or (2) that the information being disclosed will place individuals in significant risk of serious bodily injury or will pose a significant risk to national security if not provided to law enforcement or other proper authorities without further delay.

Section 4 of the bill ("Compelled Disclosure at the Request of Attorneys for the United States in Criminal Proceedings") would require the Department of Justice to demonstrate to a court "clear and convincing evidence" of a number of factors before it could compel disclosure in Federal criminal proceedings. Initially, we note that there is no evidence that the Department of Justice has abused its subpoena power to obtain source information. Indeed, since 1991, only 4.9% of the media subpoena requests that the Department's Criminal Division has processed were for source information, and only 12 such subpoenas have been issued in the last 14 years.

Additionally, the "clear and convincing" standard is a challenging one to meet, more rigorous than a "preponderance of the evidence," though less rigorous than "beyond a reasonable doubt." See, e.g., Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 431-32 (noting that the clear and convincing evidence standard is a "middle level of burden of proof"). The bill would make source information more difficult to obtain than, for example, evidence of governmental misconduct sought to be protected by the deliberative process privilege. See United States v. Lake County Bd. of Com'rs, 233 F.R.D. 523, 526 (N.D. Ind. 2005) (explaining that the deliberative process privilege can be overcome by a "sufficient showing of a particularized need to outweigh the reasons for confidentiality").

This standard might severely restrict our ability to gain access to the information. It would require the Department to establish that there were reasonable grounds, based upon information from an alternative, independent source, to believe that a crime had occurred. If knowledge of the crime came from only a single source, we might not be able to compel disclosure.

Section 4 also severely conflicts with statutory, court-imposed, and operationally essential protections for sensitive grand jury and other criminal investigative information, by replacing confidential internal Department of Justice reviews of investigative background information (i.e., the Attorney General's guidelines for the use of compulsory process against the news media) with public adversarial judicial proceedings.

Section 4 explicitly should permit compelled disclosure where the source waives the privilege.

We also note that paragraph 4(b)(2) of the bill would require that the Government demonstrate to a court, by clear and convincing evidence "to the extent possible, that the subpoena avoids requiring production of a large volume of unpublished material and is limited to the verification of published information and surrounding circumstances relating to the accuracy of the published information." Depending on how courts applied this provision, it could induce individuals to use journalists to shield documents from production.

Further, paragraph 4(b)(3) would require the Government to give reasonable and timely notice of its demand for documents. While this generally may not be problematic, the provision makes no allowance for exigent circumstances making such notice unworkable.

Finally, we note that subsection 4(a) of the bill states that it applies to "a journalist, any person who employs or has an independent contract with a journalist, or a communication service provider." However the exception provided in section 4(b) omits "communication service provider." This may be a drafting oversight.

Section 5

The provision in section 5 of the bill governing disclosure at the request of a criminal defendant is notably more lenient in favor of disclosure than that in section 4 governing disclosure at the request of attorneys for the United States in criminal proceedings. Specifically, section 5 omits two criteria applicable to requests by Government attorneys. If the intent is to balance the interests of the criminal justice system against the public interest in a privilege against disclosure, we believe that whatever standard is to apply should apply both to defendants and to the attorneys for the Government.

Section 6

Section 6 would create a privilege in civil litigation for journalists to refuse to divulge confidential sources, except upon a showing by a "clear and convincing evidence" standard of certain factors listed in subsection 6(b) of the bill. The statutory criteria for the civil privilege in section 6 of the bill ("Civil Litigation") appear to have been modeled in large part on the criteria contained in the Attorney General's guidelines for the use of compulsory process against the news media. Cf. 28 C.F.R. § 50.10(f)(2)-(4) and (6) with D.R. 850, § 6(b)(1)-(2) and (4)-(6). However, there are several potentially important differences, all of which are troubling.

First, the administration of the Attorney General's guidelines is not subject to judicial review, leaving the application of these criteria to the considered judgment and expertise of the Attorney General himself. By contrast, under section 6, the criteria would be applied by the courts, and the Attorney General's judgment about, for example, the need for the information would receive no deference. We see no reason to displace the Attorney General's judgment with that of the judiciary in this fashion.

Second, section 6 would require the district court to find that all of the designated criteria were established by "clear and convincing evidence." That evidentiary standard compounds our first concern by placing an unduly heavy burden of justification on the Government.

Third, even after all of the criteria that derive from the Attorney General's guidelines were met, section 6 would require an additional showing — again, under the "clear and convincing evidence" standard — that "nondisclosure of the information would be contrary to the public interest, taking into account both the public interest in compelling disclosure and the public interest in newsgathering." See §6(b)(3). This public-interest criterion is not found in the Attorney General's guidelines because the existing criteria are designed to limit the use of compulsory process to cases where the public interest so demands. Adding an additional public-interest hurdle is at best superfluous and at worst harmful, since it could lead a court to deny disclosure even when the information was essential to the successful completion of the case and the information could not be obtained from other sources. Indeed, the breadth of the criterion might authorize courts to act upon undisclosed and potentially irrelevant factors (as opposed to the more specific considerations set forth in the Attorney General's guidelines).

Fourth, it is unclear whether the exception for cases in which the journalist is an eyewitness or a participant in criminal or tortious conduct, see § 7, actually would limit the scope of the privilege in section 6. The section 6 privilege is confined to the identity of confidential sources and the contents of confidential information, and it is hard to imagine how that kind of information would be at issue when a journalist was being asked to testify about what he himself saw or did.

Fifth, the exception for prevention of death or substantial bodily harm (see § 8) would require a showing that death or harm was otherwise "reasonably certain" to result. "Reasonable certainty" seems an extraordinarily and unduly demanding standard for the prospective loss of life or prospective serious injury.

The foregoing discussion relates to the application of section 6 to civil litigation involving the Federal government. The statutory privilege also would apply to civil suits between private parties. We note that most Federal courts have recognized a qualified common law reporter's privilege in civil cases, see, e.g., Zerilli v. Smith, 656 F.2d 705 (D.C. Cir. 1981), and it is not obvious that the common law privilege has proven inadequate to protect legitimate newsgathering interests.

Section 7

Section 7 of the bill ("Exception for Journalist's Eyewitness Observations or Participation in Criminal or Tortious Conduct") would create an exception from the shield for crimes witnessed by the journalist. According to this section, the exception "does not apply if the alleged criminal or tortious conduct is the act of communicating the documents or information at issue." Therefore, if the crime at issue was the disclosure of the information to the journalist, then the shield would attach and the journalist would not have to disclose the source unless the Government satisfied the requirements of section 4 ("Compelled Disclosure at the Request of Attorneys for the United States in Criminal Proceedings").

This provision would virtually immunize a journalist from performing the civic duty that every other citizen is required to perform: serving as a witness to crime. Further, by excepting "disclosure" crimes, the provision would permit the journalist to participate intentionally in a violation of the criminal laws of the United States — indeed, as the recipient of the disclosure, to cause the crime to occur — with impunity. Even the more highly recognized and protected attorney-client privilege does not apply where the attorney participates in crime. We note specifically that this provision would hinder investigations of leaks of classified information.

Section 8

Section 8 of the bill ("Exception to Prevent Death or Substantial Bodily Injury") provides that a journalist has no privilege against disclosure to the extent the information is "reasonably necessary to stop or prevent reasonably certain (i) death or (ii) substantial bodily harm". We believe that the standard of "reasonably certain" death or substantial bodily harm is unreasonably difficult to meet.[2] We also believe that the exception should apply not only to information necessary to prevent death or bodily harm, but to prevent property damage as well.
